April- Creating an Effective Remote Team (ERT) for a Work From Home (WFH) Season

While many companies have resumed in office activities, there are still plenty of companies where the majority of the employees remain in the WFH category and are likely to stay there for the foreseeable future. Whether that's due to COVID-19, the improvements in distance capable systems and technology, or simple preference, if you're not currently leading a WFH team you're likely to lead one in the future.

So how can you lead an ERT and make WFH work for you? In this luncheon workshop, Rudy Ruiz shares how to create a team that not only works from home but works effectively to increase innovation and continue momentum. Rudy provides a checklist of what a truly effective remote team looks like, and then provides steps to keep your team working at maximum capacity as they work from home.

May- Goals to Growth

"How will I know if people need encouragement?" John asked. "Simple," Melvin replied. "If they're breathing, they need it."

Because your growth has benefited from the encouragement of others, your application for this lesson is to become an encouragement to someone else in their growth. One of the best ways to sustain your own growth is to be around growing people—so it makes sense to encourage others to grow!

The point is that your interactions breathe life into the other person instead of extracting life from them. Everyone needs encouragement. It's just human nature. When you can become an encourager of growth in other people, you'll find your own shift from goals to growth becoming easier along the way.

June- Team Uniformity to Team Diversity

When a team is composed of men and women of different backgrounds, experiences, beliefs and education, it better reflects the world it serves. As a leader, you may think you've got a pretty diverse team. You might even think you've got a pretty diverse set of relationships. But we can't see what we can't see—which is why the application for this lesson is an audit of your personal network.

The good news is you can change that network in one stroke: ask someone you respect and admire, "Who do you know that I should know?" Then, connect with that new person over the next month, and come prepared to listen and learn—and make a new friend.

The entire idea behind Leadershift is that the world is different for leaders today, and only the best ones will prepare. You can navigate the sea of change if you'll commit to moving from uniformity to diversity—and you'll see a vast improvement as soon as you do.

September- Trained Leaders to Transformational Leaders

The world will not be transformed without transformational leaders, women and men who look at the way things are and ask, with the hope that only leaders bring, "Why not make things better?"

This lesson's application is simple: look at your community and find an area that needs transformation. Then make a commitment to help. There are a million problems begging to be fixed; transformation begins when we pick one and go to work. The transformational leader believes, at a heart level, "Transformation begins with me."

Where will you begin?

October- Career to Calling

In this final Leadershift lesson, Rudy will discuss how a calling transcends the limits of a career, how a calling draws leaders towards something bigger, something more. A calling, to paraphrase Aristotle, is “where your talents and the needs of the world cross.”

A calling is lived over the course of your life; it is not satisfied in a single day, or even a month, or even a year. A leader with a calling is a leader committed to living his or her life in service to finding out how they can make a difference in the world. If that resonates with you, you might be called. If not, you can still make a difference by serving alongside someone else in service to their calling.

The world is vast, and the need for teammates and partners is great. No matter where you find yourself, you have one life with which to make an impact on the world. One life. Live it well and the calling will take care of itself.
